Dear Matthew,

Thank you for getting in touch with us and sharing a detailed overview of your work in this area.

I have shared your email and document with relevant colleagues for their consideration.

Conserving our nation's water is an important issue that will impact the well-being of current and future generations and we agree that more needs to be done to ensure this vital resource is available for those living now and in the future.

You may be interested in a statement we published earlier this year on how not enough action is being taken to prevent damage to our rivers and water. You can read the full statement on our website which also includes advice to people who have concerns about the quality of our water.

While water conservation is not an area we have explored before, we recognise its link to protecting all of our natural resources and tackling the climate and nature emergencies. You may be interested in the Resilient Wales chapter of our Future Generations Report 2020.

We also recognise the importance of increasing green skills and jobs and equipping our current and future generations with skills for a changing world. You may be interested in reading our Skills through Crisis: Upskilling and \(Re\)Training for a Green Recovery in Wales report.

These are urgent issues and agree with you that large industrial companies have an important role in tackling them.

We would appreciate if you could keep us updated on this work.

Thank you again for getting in touch and wish you luck with your future work.

Yours sincerely,

Petranka Malcheva
